Monday 7th January 2019

Dear Mr. Pierre,

I am writing to offer some constructive advice on your actions in a French café, that took place on the narrow streets of Paris on Friday 5th January 2018.

On the date mentioned above, I was minding my own business, enjoying a delicious slice of cake. When I looked up, I noticed that you had obtained a colossal bill for several cups of coffee which were still piled up on your table. During this time a poor, harmless beggar entered the café hoping to acquire some spare change. As he approached you (a wealthy man in a luxurious suit), he was rudely ignored. Personally, I thought this was a terrible thing to do as you clearly have plenty of money. Surely you must understand that these actions would have hurt that vulnerable man's self-confidence and denied him his basic human rights? Could you possibly have interacted and spared him just a few coins to have added much needed joy to his life?

After a while, it also came to my attention that you had misplaced your wallet. An elderly lady was sitting next to you in the busy café and, as she left for the toilet, you attempted to steal money from her brown, leather bag. What an appalling act of theft! Did you seriously expect to get away with such criminal actions?

In conclusion, it is clear that you did not think of other people's feelings and emotions when choosing your actions. Furthermore, these selfish acts may have solved your own problems but could certainly have left the others involved very hurt and disappointed. Perhaps next time, you could have a little more compassion towards others in the café.

I look forward to your response as to how you will act differently in the future.

Yours sincerely,
Miss Wightman
